

Media corporations can/will become political entities unto themselves. Without diversity of ownership within markets of news/comment, it might become extremely difficult to hold those organizations accountable, since professionals who did so risk being unemployable in the marketplace. I haven't seen anything that addresses this concern (which I do not believe is addressed by the internet/multiple cable channel assurances that would lead to diversity of art and perspective--likely even opinion, but NOT when it comes to the corporate actions of the parent company.) This concern leads me to oppose further deregulation at this time.
